LOCAL BIRD EXPERTS HEAR OF A RARE FIND

Smithsonian Ornithologists
Look Up Its History.

Discoverer of the Skeleton Thought
It a Fossil.

Another Specimen Afterward Found on an Unfrequented Island—The Latest Fowl Brings $10,000.

A few days ago word was received at the Smithsonian Institution that another specimen of the Notornis Mantelli, one of the rarest of the tropical birds had been found in New Zealand. The information created quite a stir among the ornithologists, and they have busied themselves in looking up the history of the bird for the benefit of the public. A local ornithologist gives the following story of it:

"This particular specimen of the Notornis family was discovered many years ago by Dr. Mantell, of London, while on a trip to New South Wales. The bird itself was not seen by its discoverer, but a skeleton of it was found on a small island near New Zealand, and it was thought to be a fossil. The bones were carefully collected, and taken to England where, after being properly articulated, they were placed in the British Museum and labeled as a prehistoric fossil. Many years later, some sailors from a passing vessel discovered the tracks of a large bird in the sand on the beach of a small island near where the original find was made. They followed the tracks and soon came upon a live bird the like of which they had never seen. It was taken to the vessel from which they had come where it was instantly recognized by some scientists aboard as a perfect specimen of the prehistoric fowl found by Dr. Mantell. The men were greatly elated over their find and this specimen was taken to the British Museum where it was stuffed and placed beside the skeleton previously contributed by Dr. Mantell.

As the latter was the discoverer of the bird it was given his name and will be known henceforth as the Notornis Mantelli. A second specimen was found on another island a number of years afterward, and a few days ago a third bird was discovered on still another island. It is one of the strange features of these discoveries that it is not believed that a single one of the specimens now known to exist inhabited the same island, although they were found in about the same locality. The last bird discovered created quite a sensation in scientific circles, and some idea of the value of the object may be gained from the fact that after some lively bidding the city government of Auckland, New South Wales, purchased the feathered bird for two thousand pounds sterling—$10,000.

The bird is a member of the rail family, and like most of its kind found in cold regions, it is blue in color. It is about the size of an ordinary domestic fowl and has the appearance of a guinea fowl. The finding of the Mantelli has given the ornithologists hope that another specimen of the Notornis Alba, sometimes called the Fulica Alba and more commonly known as the White Fulica, will be found. This bird is probably the rarest of the tropical feathered species. Only one specimen is known to exist, although ornithologists are positive that the birds did exist in large numbers in about the same localities as the Mantelli. This specimen, after a long and varied career, finally brought up in the Imperial Museum in Vienna, Austria, where it is now exhibited. The fowl was discovered by John White, Esq., a Scotchman, who was one of the most complete institutions of its kind in the world. At the death of Sir Ashton, the specimen was sold under the hammer and was finally knocked down to the representatives of the Emperor of Austria for $5,000.

Dr. White was making a tour of New South Wales and the islands nearby when he discovered the bird. A number of sailors landed on a small island, which they named Lord Howe's Island, to get a supply of turtles. While engaged in hunting the crustaceans, the seamen found a large flock of pure white birds which resembled in every way the guinea fowl except that they were white. The birds were not frightened by the appearance of the men, and seemed to have considerable curiosity regarding their movements.

The hunt for the turtles was abandoned when the white birds were spied, and the sailors busied themselves in knocking the fowls on the head, that being the most convenient way of killing them. A number of the flock were secured in this manner, and one of them was stripped of its skin taken to England where it was presented to Sir Ashton Lever, who had it stuffed. Several times after that the birds were seen, but as such numbers that the scientists did not think they would become extinct. Suddenly, however, they disappeared and since ever in the present century not another specimen has been seen, although numerous searches have been made for it. The bird is pure white in color, and, like the Mantelli, is about the size of the guinea fowl, it too, resembles the guinea fowl and has red legs and a large red comb.

Both of these birds are members of the rail family and are of the varieties known only to exist in the vicinity of New Zealand and New South Wales. The Fulica has a peculiar appendix on each shoulder which resembles a spur and with which the bird defends itself. It does not fly very well and lived mostly on the level. A full account of the fowl and its habits was written by Mr. White in the morning after his voyage to New South Wales, and this the first and only mention that has ever been made of it.

THINGS THEATRICAL.

"It is not loving but marrying a girl beneath you that constitutes the crime," remarks one of the characters in Robertson's "Caste," and it is upon the right English social law that made such a possibility what many consider his best comedy, "Sweet Lavender." The piece, which was originally done in this country by a cast in which were both Herbert Keiley and Edie Shannon, recounts the story of an English lawyer who falls in love with the daughter of his housekeeper. The parents of both parties interfere and the most unpleasant prospects are in view for each when Dick Phenyl, an old drunkard whose heart and head have remained clear, straightens matters out to the satisfaction of all concerned. There are no violent emotions portrayed in the play, but the charm of its tale is greatly enhanced by the delicacy of its humor, the beauty of its pathos, and the quaint atmosphere of the Temple, that abode in which all the characters of the work live and which was made so famous by Dickens. "Sweet Lavender" will be done next week at the Columbia by the Frawley Company and a most remarkable cast is promised for the presentation.

"That Man," "On and Off," "A Mist Marriage," "Rev. Growth Davenport," "The Christian," "A Dog in the Manger," "Hotel Topsy Turvy," "A War Correspondent," and "Zaza" form a part of the brilliant list of first productions which Washington has had in the past season. The last of the year's premieres promises to be the equal, in its way, of any of those named. It occurs next Monday night at the National Theatre, where Mme. Pilar-Morin will be seen in Henri Melhae's farce, "My Cousin." M. Melhae is the author of "The Cuckoo," which is now running in New York, and his last effort was originally done in Paris by Mme. Rejane. Mme. Pilar-Morin is a French woman who first came to this country for a tour in "Orange Blossoms," in which she was supported by an excellent company, in which are John T. Sullivan, Lida McMullan, Matilda Cotterly, Beryl Hope, Frank Tannehill, Jr., and Earl Brown, and has fitted her production with elaborate scenery and costumes. Although there seems little reason to anticipate anything but success in connection with the presentation of "My Cousin" and the piece will probably have a Washington endorsement when it goes into Wallack's.

A number of old favorites in local amusement circles come to the heart of the week with "The Broadway Burlesques" and the result should be a series of excellent shows. Though very conservative, Washington is also working up a list of popular idols, and a combination which features people of that sort is sure of good luck here. From all accounts "The Broadway Burlesques" not only have several favorites here and are well remembered in this city, but a number who are sure to be after their engagement. In this class are Le Clair and Leslie, female impersonators; Smith and Cook, farceurs; Bennett and Rich, song illustrators; the Mitchell Sisters, soubrettes; Merritt and Rosella, acrobats; Marie Richmond, serio-comic; Cohen and Gardner, vocalists; and Dave Lewis, monologist. Besides being seen in the olio all of these performers appear in the afterpart provided, a supposedly witty skit, entitled "Gay Monte Carlo."

Two events of more than ordinary importance are scheduled within the next few days at the Bijou. The first of these is a testimonial benefit to be tendered the house stock company tomorrow evening and the second is a singing contest which Manager Griesbach has worked up as a feature of next week's bill. The concert is given as an evidence of the appreciation with which the management of the Bijou regard the efforts of the organization restorers and the competition is a novelty destined to give entertainment to the patrons of the little place of amusement. In the test George Diamond has arranged to render "She Was Happy Till She Met You," Flora Parker will give "Will I Find My Maiden There," Sam Adams has selected "Mid the Green Fields of Virginia," and Will Thornton will be heard in "The Girl I Loved in Sunny Tennessee." Stereoscopic illustrations will be used with each song. All four contestants are favorites here and the struggle will probably be a warm one.

THE ORGANIZED CARPENTERS.

The thirty-ninth annual report of the Amalgamated Society of the International Amalgamated Society of Carpenters and Joiners, which has just been issued from the headquarters of the organization, at Manchester, England, show it to be in a very prosperous condition. During the last year, there has been a large increase of membership in the affiliated unions throughout the world. Financially, the organization has also passed a very prosperous year, the total amount turned into the treasury, being $723,830, which is an increase of $27,440 over last year. In keeping with the increase of membership and influence of the unions affiliated with the International Amalgamated Society of Carpenters and Joiners, is noted the progress of the local branch of the organization. During the last year it is stated that the increase of membership was 25 per cent greater than that of 1897, which was also in advance of that of the previous year.

Sunday at Beautiful Glen Sligo.

The opening of Glen Sligo Park took place the past week, the news of which will be gratifying to the pleasure-seekers of Washington. A magnificent cafe and dancing pavilion have been added to the park since last year. Prof. Caldwell's orchestra will furnish music on Sunday from 2 until 11 p. m., and every evening in the future from 7 to 11. T. W. Harris, president of the Glen Sligo Railway, will inaugurate many novel attractions during the summer, thereby maintaining the reputation of one of the most popular resorts in Washington.

Overlooking the falls of Sligo, and crowning the crest of a high hill, is the colonial log cabin railway station, the picturesque spot in this vicinity. The surrounding country is made a scene of beauty by the blooming wild flowers. There are unexplored fields for the botanist and delightful places for church and Sunday school picnics. Transfers will be given to passengers to Seventh and Boundary, then take the Brightwood cars. New palace cars and rapid transit will be the feature for Sunday.

FIRST SIGHT OF INDIA.

Bombay Like a Dream of Strange Lights and Sounds.

(G. W. Stevens, in the London Mail). The first sight of India is amazing, entrancing, stupefying. Of other countries you become aware gradually; Italy looks up to the Levant, and Egypt passes you on; in the desert. Landed in Bombay, you have strayed into a most elaborate dream. Infinite variety, blurred with complexity, a gallery of strange faces, a buzz of strange voices, a rainbow of strange colors, a garden of strange growths, a book of strange questions, a pantheon of strange gods. Different beasts and birds in the street, different clothes to wear, different meal-times, and different food—the very commonest things are altered. You begin a new life in a new world.

It takes time to come to yourself. At first everything is so noticeable that you notice nothing. When things begin to come sorted and sifted, Bombay reveals itself as a city of monstrous contrasts.

Along the sea front one splendid public building follows another—variegated stone, facades with arch and colonnade, cupola, and minaret and minaret. At their feet, huddle flimsy huts of matting, thatched with leaves, which a day's rain would reduce to mud and pulp. You sit in a marble-paved club, vast and airy as a Roman villa, and look out over gardens of heavy scarlet and purple flowers toward choking alleys, where half-naked savages herd by families together in open-fronted rooms, and fifth runs down gutters to fester. In the sunken street, in this quarter you may see the weaver twirling his green and amber wool on a hand loom—a skeleton so simple and fragile that a kick would make sticks of it; go to the street corner and you see black smoke belch from a hundred roaring mills, whose competition cuts the throat of all the world. In the large, open space Parsies bowl each other underhand full-pitches and cry, "Thank you, thank you," after the ball; by the rail aquas a Hindoo, who would like, if only the law would let him, to marry babies and burn widows.

Yet, for all its incongruities, Bombay never lets you forget that it is a very great city. If it had no mills it would be renowned for its port; if it had neither a port nor a mill it would be famous for its beauty. And if it were as ugly as it is fair it would still be one of the most astounding collections
